A blog post title is an introduction. It should tell readers what they can expect to learn or view within the blog post, or tease them about what might be coming up next week on your blog's column page. Therefore, a blog post title should have a strong call-to-action. Blog titles are designed to grab attention and let the reader know what to expect in a blog post. The title of a blog post will be displayed in bold at the top of the page in some skins, so it is important to keep it concise and interesting. It is also featured on Google searches. It is considered good blogging practice to try to use keywords from your blog's topic or niche when possible, but don't overdo it unless your keywords will add context or humor that readers might enjoy. Some examples include:

Hemingway, or The Paris Review, was an American literary magazine that began in 1935 and ran for 87 years. It was published by the Ernest Hemingway Foundation, and included works from prominent authors such as Robert Frost and Henry Miller. In 1950, the magazine began to publish fiction exclusively (before this point it had published non-fiction essays about writing). The title of The Paris Review features a quote from author Ernest Hemingway: "There is nothing to writing. All you do is sit down at a typewriter and bleed."

The title of the blog post is also the headline (what you see when you click on the link). It is the most important piece to the blog post. The title should be descriptive of what the reader will learn within the blog post. Some tips for writing a great title:

The introduction is an optional section that should be written if the blog post will be particularly long. It's purpose is to give a preview to the blog post, and convince the reader to continue reading. If you do decide to add an introduction, it should be short and concise. It can be used as a way to summarize key points in the blog post, or it could be used as a hook to draw readers in. Some tips for writing a great introduction:
